Meaningful Societal Returns

Changing the Family Legacy

Ronnie has overcome losing a brother to gang violence, having a brother shot and requiring around-the-clock care and a twin sister who is a victim of sex trafficking and missing for almost three months. LeRoy Haynes Short-Term Residential Therapeutic Program has been Ronnie's nurturing home for nine months.

Recreational and cultural activities help give Haynes' teens a real understanding of infinite opportunities and possibilities.

Diligently working to complete school credits, Ronnie will graduate Bonita High School on June 6. He will be the only one of his siblings to earn a high school diploma and he plans to attend Mount San Antonio Community College in the fall. Recently Ronnie began working at Marshalls department store with the bridge to work program. He is a mentor helping teens to be successful at Haynes.

Although he sometimes struggles with life circumstances, Ronnie has learned to seek out someone to talk with or just spends time with staff when he feels lost. It is his newfound communication skills that have helped change his trajectory.

When Ronnie came to Haynes he was shutdown and not sure what he wanted to do. Recently, he made the decision not to transition home because he doesn't want to become a "statistic." His goal is to get an education and work with kids. Ronnie says, "I feel I will have a lot to offer." (Name changed for privacy.)

Transformative Support

Daniel S. Maydeck
President & Chief Executive Officer

For over a decade, I have been privileged to lead an exceptional group of individuals committed to a singular goal: to stop at nothing to ensure the success and wellbeing of every child. Throughout its history, Haynes has actively balanced advocacy with the provision of direct services. While advocacy activities have always constituted a small part of our operations, we learned early on that public policy and systems change are often critical to meeting the needs of the most vulnerable children and their families.

I am pleased to report that the results of our and other's advocacy efforts are especially evident. Historically, public child welfare agencies intervened with children without acknowledging families' struggles with intergenerational trauma, poverty and community violence.

Today, public and private child welfare agencies recognize the social and economic context of child and family challenges, along with the need to intervene in much broader ways. For Haynes, this transformation has enabled us to work within homes, schools and communities across California to help children and families in ways that are dramatically more supportive and culturally relevant than in the past.

I am deeply gratified by this evolution, and in these pages you will see the results. Indeed, those results were only possible because of your support for a superb staff and associates that believe deeply in the potential of each child and family we serve.

Eating lunch daily in the dining hall helps students learn social skills, manage sensory processing challenges and build the foundation for community inclusion.

From Seclusion to Community Engagement

Teachers and staff call her Abby. When she came to Bliss Academy - School for Autism and Developmental Disabilities as a high schooler she had intense behavior issues and her parents were at a loss for how to help. They said she was left tied to a chair all day at her previous school to keep her safe. Tears rolled from Dad's face when he first shared her story with the Bliss Academy team. Abby was non-verbal and couldn't leave her house due to severe sensory issues. Her family couldn't even go out in the community without Abby dropping to the floor and grabbing at people.

The teaching staff created a program for Abby where they initially established a multi-modal communication system for her to express her wants and needs. Concurrently, staff targeted her sensory needs and provided her with tools to cope with such challenges. With these behavior modification interventions in place, Abby was able to access an academic and social skills curriculum through classroom and community-based instruction.

When she exited the Bliss Academy program at age 22, she was able to experience family vacations, tolerate plane rides and enjoy cruises with parents and siblings. Even today her parents keep in touch, updating teachers and aides on Abby's activities and community involvement.

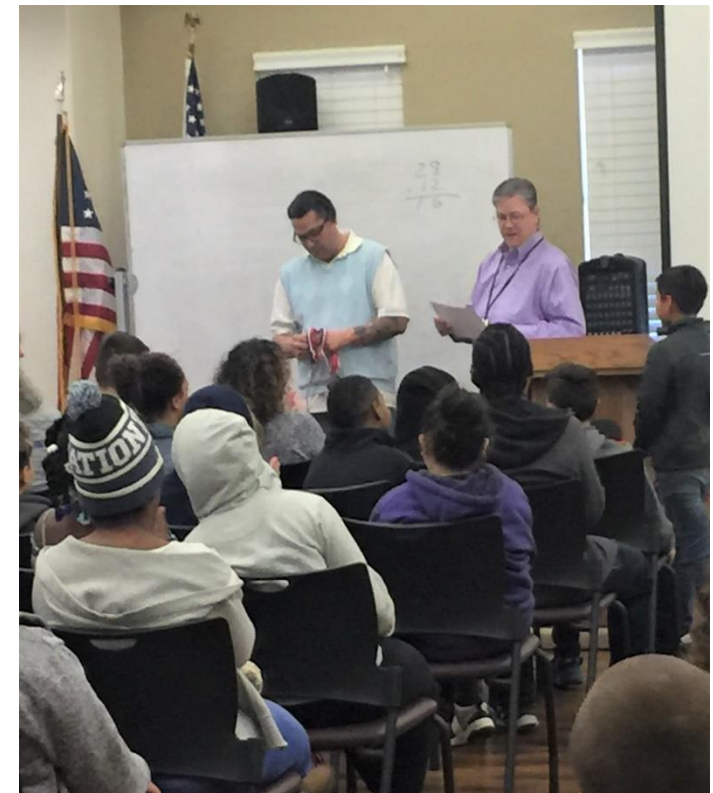

Stayed the Course and Built a Career

James is a young man who had not been very successful in school. He struggled greatly with social situations and academics. When James enrolled in Renaissance Community Prep - School for Behavior and Learning Diversity, the staff could quickly see he really wanted to do well and please others, he just didn't know how. With the support of the staff and his willingness to work and learn, James began to have success in school.

James started to be more social and gain self-esteem. At the end of his senior year of high school, James did not have enough credits to graduate.

After experiencing success in school and learning to self-manage his behavior, James wanted his high school diploma. He asked to remain at Renaissance and after a fifth year of high school James earned his diploma.

Feeling the exuberance of success and with diploma in hand James was eager to join the workforce. Today James has a family and a career in masonry. He works for a company that contracts with several municipalities throughout Southern California and is a contributing member of his community.

Students received awards, medals and gift cards for academic achievement and perfect attendance as they were celebrated during a recent honor roll assembly.

Forging Ahead in the U.S. Navy

Robert began receiving community mental health services in 2017, at the age of 16, after being referred by the Pomona Unified School District. At the time he was having difficulty performing well in school, had several failing grades, was unmotivated and fearful of not being able to graduate or be successful in the future. He often discussed having poor self-esteem and feeling that he would "fail at life" and end up like his father an, "unemployed alcoholic."

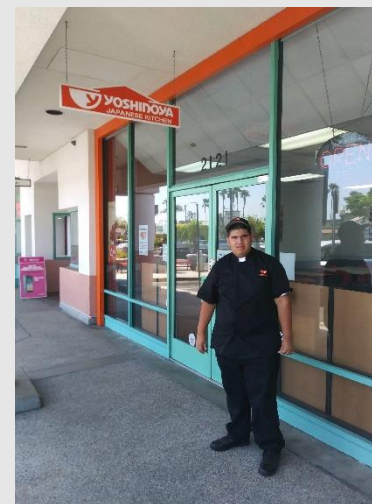

During his time in treatment and through the strong bond he created with his therapist Tom and Child and Family Specialist Kru, Robert began to see himself in a different light. With the help of his team and a goal of success in mind, he began using his coping skills and increased self-esteem to graduate high school and enlist in the Navy.

Currently, Robert is completing basic training in Great Lakes, Illinois and plans to be transferred to Virginia where he will begin training as an intelligence specialist. Robert who assumed he would "fail in life," will soon be preparing and presenting briefings, organizing reconnaissance missions and maintaining intelligence databases with the intention to secure our country from any perceived threat.

HAYNES FAMILY OF PROGRAMS

Staff, board members, alumni, volunteers and supporters believe:

A nurturing, caring, non-judgmental, therapeutic community fosters results for the clients we serve, as well as ourselves.

Learning to Navigate the Workplace

There is dignity in earning an honest wage, but many youth with special needs don't get that opportunity or it is short-lived because they lack the supportive services necessary to succeed in the workforce.

S.T.A.R. Academy was contracted by Los Angeles Unified School District to provide Noah, a 20-year old, 12th grader, the following non-public agency services: supplemental academic support, transition services and language and speech.

STAR Academy Education Specialist Luis Juarez worked with Noah to apply for a position with Yoshinoya. Noah is working at his very first job and the manager shared he is doing well.
